Moving to the Aristotelian perspective, we shift our focus from mere survival to the quality of human life.

First, the Purpose of the State. Aristotle argued that a government exists for more than just physical security; its true goal is to foster human flourishing, or Eudaimonia. Hobbes emphasized surveillance might provide safety, Aristotle would ask if a society is truly 'good' if its citizens feel too stifled to live freely. If monitoring prevents us from thriving, the state is failing its highest purpose.

Second, Humans as 'Political Animals'. Aristotle believed humans reach their full potential by participating in public life. However, digital surveillance—like social media tracking—creates a 'chilling effect' where we begin to self-censor. This destroys our ability to be truly 'political animals' because we become too afraid to explore radical ideas or speak truth to power when we know we are being watched.

Third, Autonomy and the 'Golden Mean'. Aristotle's 'Golden Mean' suggests that virtue is found in balance—in this case, a balance between total anonymity and total transparency. For Aristotle, you aren't being 'moral' if you only behave because a camera is pointed at you. Constant surveillance strips away our autonomy, turning us into compliant subjects rather than self-governing citizens who choose to do the right thing.

Finally, the Modern Connection to Predictive Policing. Modern surveillance uses AI and algorithmic profiling to judge us based on data before we even act. Aristotle believed in human reason and our capacity for growth, but these tools reduce us to static, predictable data points. This treats people like objects to be managed rather than rational agents capable of making their own moral choices.
